1 Introduction

I have always held an interest in Economics; I like it as an intersection of mathematics, and as an applicable social science. During the COVID lock-downs, many places in the U.S. faced food shortages. It was these events that really prompted me to leave my sales job to pursue something that I believe could have a bigger and positive impact on my local and national community. My main focus in pursuing a Master's in Managerial Economics was to work in a position (possibly at the Department of Agriculture) that would serve to support the national food supply. Through my academic and research journey, I have also developed an interest in international trade and labor economics.

I have fumbled my way through datasets in the past, and I have seen that one can truly harness data to gain insights and convey a story. However, I am no master in this area, and I think improving my skills in how I access and work with data could truly be beneficial.
